See State v. Pearson, 135 Vt. 219, 221, 376 A.2d 1353, 1355 (1977). In Pearson, we noted that a good faith challenge to the validity of a guilty plea may be raised at any time. State v. Koss, 137 Vt. 632, 633, 409 A.2d 633, 634 (1979); State v. Lambert, 137 Vt. 279, 284, 404 A.2d 1025, 1028 (1979), but even if it can be raised after judgment has been entered, the absence of a factual record, the existence of which was created at the time of the plea, precludes the court from reviewing a defendant's good faith. Pearson, 135 Vt. at 221, 376 A.2d at 1355. In the present case, defendant's plea was made without the presence of the judge who would later accept it. The state court was without the factual basis necessary to make the required determination. Under the circumstances, the judgment is void and cannot stand. See Andrews v. Swartz, 133 Vt. 539, 542, 349 A.2d 514, 517 (1975)

XML (extensible markup language) was designed to allow creation of files or documents that are readable by both humans and computers. XML is a machine-readable language, similar to HTML, CSS and Javascript. XML is a dialect of SGML (Standard Generalized Markup Language) and so shares its history. For example, the HTML tag is derived from the SGML tag tag. XML is an acronym for Extensible Markup Language and is a markup language, meaning it is used to markup text with additional information about the data, the author, or the meaning of the document. XML describes the elements of a document using tags. For example, the HTML document may have a header and a body. The header is described by tags like `<h1>`, and the body is described using other tags, such as `` for paragraph, `` for emphasized text, and `<ul>` for a list. XML documents have similar tags to describe the elements. XML was designed to be human-readable, and so every tag has a start and end tag, which is very similar to HTML tags. The XML tags look like opening and closing tags, but it is not necessary to use any opening and closing tags. This is very different from HTML. Tags are essentially strings of characters, and the name of the tag is the string between the opening and closing tags. Unlike HTML, which has only a few tags, XML has a much larger number of tags. The number of tags in XML is independent of the number of characters in the tag. This makes it easier to create complex and well-structured documents in XML.
